Flint, Michigan water crisis

2016

Jake May is a photographer living in Flint, Michigan who works as the chief photojournalist for The Flint Journal. Captured in this image is Flint resident Andrea Watson in tears as she isn't allowed to hear the governor speak publicly to Flint for the first time about the declared state of emergency due to the city's drinking poor water. While less in focus, in the front of the photo we can see another woman, this time carrying a jug of brown water that appears to be directly from the tap displaying the poisoned water.
